Customer Reviews

After reading your book, I wrote the letter below to my newspaper editor. Subject: What do grown children owe their parents? Do adult children owe their parents for what they've done while growing up? What does honor thy father and honor thy mother really mean? What are the duties and responsibilities towards parents by their children? I believe that most parents would agree with me that our children don't owe us anything for bringing them into the world. Of course if our parents are disabled and unable to take care of themselves financially or physically, we have a moral obligation to provide for them. But if they mismanage their money and the money that we give them, we do not have an obligation to provide for them. Editor, my mother is not good with handling money. Even though she earned enough financially to live comfortably, she mismanages her money and so she is unable to pay her bills. And because she is unable to pay her bills, she believes it's her children's responsibility to bail her out every time because she brought them into the world. As a result, she demands money from them. When she doesn't have money, she behaves like a drug addict looking for a fix. She goes about begging everyone for money. She's a "money addict," and money is her drug. Editor, her demand for money is daunting. Whenever she gets money, she squanders it. She never has money. And yet, no matter how much or how many times that I give her money, she always wants more. She's never satisfied or grateful. And if I don't have to give to her, she would tell me the most hurtful things that you can tell a child.
